Projects to improve the application of digital technologies in universities have benefited the wider community, according to a report by the Million+ group of new universities. The study of more than 100 projects funded by the Joint Information Systems Committee (Jisc) finds that 44 per cent have had unanticipated benefits. The report, From Inputs to Impact: A Study of the Impact of Jisc Funding on Universities, states that even relatively modest awards of £30,000 can have a “profound impact”.
